Introduction

Re-reading my chapter in the recently published Voices of the Transition<sup>1</sup> where I offer a personal journey for and into democracy in South Africa, I noticed that I barely mention my Rhodes experience of 1980. This is curious, given that my years at Rhodes were, in many ways, life-changing. It was a time when my Marxism developed, when I engaged in national political activity, aboveground and underground, and when I was arrested, and later convicted of ANC activities. What follows, then, fleshes out my personal journey through Rhodes University during the 1980s.

Black consciousness, Marxism and non-racialism

Guy Berger, then a Journalism lecturer and now Head of Media Studies, first introduced me to Rhodes University in 1979. Guy used to attend meetings of a youth programme in my home town, East London, called Masazane (meaning 'let's get together'), of which I was assistant coordinator. It was affiliated to the South African Institute of Race Relations (SAIRR), but had sufficient independence to be a home for radical political discussion, including black consciousness and the re-emerging ANC/SACP perspective, as articulated by people like Guy and Mandla Gxanyana, an ANC operative working under the guise of Black Consciousness. These perspectives engaged with the liberal perspectives of the SAIRR.

While on the one hand I was attracted to the black identity bestowed upon all oppressed people (i.e. African, Indian and coloured) by Black Consciousness, I was also inclined not to see all whites as oppressors, and all blacks as saviours. I was drawn to the understanding that apartheid was a systemic problem, and individuals were socialised to think and act in various ways. In particular, I was impressed by the class and gender analysis offered by Guy and others (including Jacky Cock, a guest speaker at Masazane), which allowed me to see beyond race as the only or primary line of fracture in our society.

Of particular significance is that Guy alerted me to a strange subject called Sociology, and, given my rejection by UCT on race grounds, encouraged me to study at Rhodes. I could get a special permit to do so if I registered for Journalism, because it was not offered at my ethnic university, UDW.

Both Guy and Mandla gave me ANC and SACP literature to read, and when I went to Rhodes in 1980, I started reading Marxist texts as part of my courses, and joined a reading group to study the ANC and SACP. This was supported by my contact with an increasingly explicit expression of Congress allegiances by NUSASs, and later AZASO (which was already moving away from BC towards a non-racial Congress position, and increasingly co-operating with NUSAS). However, despite my inclinations towards the ANC and SACP, the New Left literature I was exposed to at Rhodes made me wary of their allegiance to the Soviet Union, and introduced me to emerging anti-Stalinist currents within the party, exemplified by activists like Ruth First and Rob Davies, based in Mozambique.

At Rhodes I also met Non-European Unity Movement (NEUM) activists who preached a hard-line non-racial, pro-boycott class perspective, and these debates were highly charged amongst black students on campus. I was part of an initiative to set up the Phoenix Cultural Society, which was an attempt to politicise students on campus, alongside the initiatives of NUSAS. However, the NEUM and BC activists would have nothing to do with NUSAS, so, in the interests of unity amongst black students, I found myself treading a fine line between my BC and NEUM comrades, and my comrades in the non-racial ANC-aligned socialist camp on campus, with whom I felt most at home. In addition to these influences, I had been approached by the ANC underground to plan a boycott of the upcoming Lions tour of South Africa, and a boycott of the South African Indian Council (SAIC) elections (none of which materialised at that time).

By the time I was arrested in July 1980 for possessing banned material and furthering the aims of the ANC and SACP, I was well on my way to becoming a committed underground activist.

The politics of boycott

All universities were subject to the constraints of apartheid, and Rhodes was no exception. In 1980 black students had to apply for special permission to attend Rhodes, and were housed separately from white students. We were a tiny minority on the campus, and felt like colonial subjects in a white world. Rhodes consciously saw itself as an extension of the British university, particularly of the traditional Oxbridge type. The residences were strictly segregated according to gender, and female students had to be in by a certain time. They were not allowed male visitors. Tea was quaintly served for all staff and students at specific tea times in the garden. The buildings, halls and images made you feel that you might be in England, and indeed this was the intention:

the university was established primarily to cater for the needs of English-speaking white students in the colony.

However, there was a secondary consideration, which was to civilise the natives into the mores of English culture. Cecil John Rhodes was after all the 'civilising' agent of British imperialism. Apartheid, however, upset this mission, and the university, partially because of its liberal-colonial mission, and partly due to pressure from students, did seek to bypass apartheid restrictions in certain instances. For example, Rhodes was the first 'white' university to racially desegregate its residences during 1980.

Being housed together, however, had the effect of creating a strong sense of solidarity amongst black students, and accelerated the political conscientisation of new students. All black students, as well as those white students who identified with the struggle against apartheid, were called upon to boycott all non-academic and non-residence facilities at Rhodes. This included the SRC, all sports facilities such as playing fields and squash courts, and activities such as Rag. Because black students were not allowed to use off-campus facilities such as cinemas and pubs, white sympathisers were asked to boycott those. Great resentment was shown towards those who chose to defy this boycott, and they were invariably ostracised.

A positive aspect of the facilities boycott was that it obliged us to build links with the townships. We thus played soccer on township fields, and attended social gatherings in the townships. This formed part of a broader argument that the university, positioned as it was cheek by jowl with the townships, needed to orient its teaching and research to grapple with social problems in its vicinity. In addition, the facilities of Rhodes needed to be accessible to the broader public, including the impoverished black residents of Grahamstown.

The boycott tactic centered very much around the politics of the South African Council on Sport (SACOS), which argued that there could be 'no normal sport in an abnormal society'. This view was extended to life at the university, such that there could be no normal university experience in an abnormal society. Participation in apartheid institutions was seen as legitimising those institutions, and the boycott strategy was meant to de-legitimise them.

It was a slogan that was popularised during the BC era, and which re-emerged with great force during the upsurge that followed the repression of BC organisations during 1977-8. The pendulum had swung towards Cape Town, starting with the Fattis and Monis strike and consumer boycott in 1979, and followed by the red meat strike and boycott in 1980. These events coincided with a massive high school student boycott throughout Cape Town in 1980, and which began to spread to other parts of the country. Politically active students at Rhodes, including many NUSAS students, were keen to express their solidarity with the strikes and boycotts.

Matters reached a head as the June exams approached. Black students were incensed by the increased brutality of state repression against the high school students, and argued that the boycott should extend to university students, as an act of solidarity. The counter-argument was that this would achieve little, and only result in students missing a year of study. They would be dispersed into their communities, and be deprived of the opportunity to assemble and plan effective solidarity action from their university base. This issue was debated fiercely, and late into the night. Eventually the latter position won out, to the relief of many students.

A site of critical engagement

The argument against a ‘simplistic’ boycott strategy came from the ANC/SACP perspective, which was forged during a long period of struggle that saw the boycott as a tactical weapon, and not a principle cast in stone. It should be used to achieve certain objectives under particular conditions, on the understanding that tactics of engagement might be more appropriate under other conditions. This was also the approach of the re-emerging trade union movement, which employed strikes and stayaways, as well as negotiations, to achieve its objectives.

The mere fact that we were at Rhodes University, under a racial permit, contradicted the simplistic boycott strategy, notwithstanding the convoluted arguments of SACOS and the NEUM that exempted places of learning from the boycott. Some of us were keen to use the resources Rhodes offered to further the struggle against apartheid capitalism. While we knew participation in the SRC was going to split black students down the middle, covertly using SRC and other university resources, through the support of our white allies in the SRC, to prosecute the struggle could still be pursued. This approach was adopted at all campuses where NUSAS and other leftist student groups had a strong presence, paving the way for an alliance between NUSAS and AZASO in the years to follow. University resources played a major role in supporting the Fattis and Monis and red meat consumer boycotts, and the Release Mandela Campaign. Copies of the Freedom Charter and other anti-apartheid material were easily printed at the university, and widely distributed.

NUSAS nationally produced impressive publications unmasking the Total Strategy of P.W. Botha, including analyses of the Wiehahn and Riekert Commissions. It also celebrated the revolutions in Angola and Mozambique. Many of these publications were banned, but that did not prevent their circulation on campus, alongside other radical publications such as Work In Progress, The SA Labour Bulletin, Africa Perspective, and others. All of these were collaborations between students and radical lecturers.

Despite its colonial trappings, Rhodes under Derek Henderson did, in large measure, try to live up to its liberal standards. It protested vigorously when we were arrested, sought to protect academic freedom zealously, and allowed a diverse range of intellectual currents to run through its academic programmes. These included Marxism, particularly in Sociology, History and Political Studies. I was even allowed to introduce a Marxist perspective in my relatively conservative Economic History class.

On one occasion, when the Sociology head of department, Professor Higgins, failed my first year essay, calling it 'Marxist claptrap', he had the grace to concede later that he was in a bad mood when he marked it, and subsequently increased the mark to 65 percent (It was not a great essay, I was told by my Sociology lecturer Jacky Cock, who intervened on my behalf!). This revealed the degree of respect and power enjoyed by radical academics within particular spaces on campus, despite the fact that the student body on the whole (many of whom were ex-Rhodesians), as well as the administration (staffed by many ex-Rhodesians) was known to be more conservative than other English campuses.

Although all social science departments during those years were run by liberals of various hues, the space for radical, mainly Marxist, thought was opened for me in Journalism (Guy Berger), Sociology (Jacky Cock and Richard de Villiers) and Political Studies (Terence Beard), as well as History (Jeff Peires). Both the Liberal and Marxist perspectives, however, were anti-apartheid, which made me feel comfortable within those spaces of intellectual engagement I chose to attach myself to. In addition, despite my intellectual aversion to liberal capitalism, I was attracted to a libertarian interpretation of Marxism (i.e. a socialist vision of equality that contained substantial liberal freedoms).

The Rhodes Library contained many Marxist texts, from Marx's own works to the then-popular neo-Marxist world systems, dependency and under-development perspectives. Journals such as Socialist Register, New Left Review, Monthly Review, Review of African Political Economy and others were readily available, which surprised me. Many contained influential Marxist interpretations of the South African social formation, including those by well-known exiles such as Harold Wolpe and Martin Legassick. Of course, many texts were banned, but available under restriction – including Marx's more political writings, and more explicitly revolutionary work by writers like Joe Slovo, John Saul and others.

As students we delighted in attending lectures by liberal academics, and adding Marxist texts to the reading list, so that we could challenge them in class. The Rhodes Library was a favourite hangout, and we could not get enough of this fabulous literature we had never seen before.

Quite why the apartheid regime allowed the English universities such liberties remains a mystery to me. Was it because it served to maintain a façade of normality to the outside world, as a racially exclusive bourgeois democracy? Security police surveillance of universities was very evident, and they acted to detain activists who had become radicalised on campus. Yet they did not venture to ban the study of Marxism, or Marxist interpretations of South African history, or prevent access to a range of Marxist texts and journals. However, they did ban all ANC and SACP literature, and other pro-Soviet literature. Did they feel that academic Marxism posed no threat?

If they did, then it was short sighted from their own point of view. As activists we were nourished by the access to radical thought of all kinds, and simply merged these with our understanding of the ANC and SACP. It deepened a non-Stalinist appreciation of Marxist politics that encompassed the re-emerging trade union movement, and undermined the narrow nationalist perspectives coming from black consciousness. Students and ex-students went on to play pivotal roles in the formation of community organisations, trade unions, the UDF and other radical organisations throughout the country. These organisations owe much of their independent radical outlook (embracing feminism, the environment, and participatory forms of democracy) to universities like Rhodes, which facilitated access to new intellectual practices occurring globally.

Carrying on the critical tradition

Rhodes University now operates in a very different environment. There is no anti-apartheid struggle, and students are in the main pre-occupied with getting a qualification that will secure them a good job. While this was always the intention of most students under apartheid, there was also a critical minority that used the university space primarily for subversive (anti-apartheid and/or anti-capitalist) purposes. Today universities are called upon to support socio-economic development within a neoliberal environment, where corporate needs and values are threatening their role as spaces of critical thought and engagement. New voices of subversion are emerging, but are still tiny and fragmented.

Can the critical tradition of certain spaces within the university (particularly within the social sciences) be maintained? So far there is little to suggest that government intends narrowing that space – at least not overtly. However, the threat comes from other sources. Given relatively low salaries, academics are tempted to supplement their income by performing consultancy work for government, the private sector or international agencies. Once they do that, they diminish or constrain their ability to engage critically with those with power – whether they be in government, dominant political parties, big business or international institutions such as the World Bank. Does this explain why academics today, in a much more liberal environment of free expression, seem less prominent as independent, critical public intellectuals than during the apartheid years?

But what does ‘being critical’ mean in today’s global and national environment? A critical perspective, I believe, does not have to mean criticising government as a matter of principle, or uncritically supporting opposition parties and movements. The critical tradition, in the post-liberal or radical sense, has always meant articulating the interests of those without power – particularly the poor and marginalised – in the pursuit of social harmony based on social justice. In other words, it means speaking Truth to Power – wherever that power resides. Certainly, most power resides within governments and the corporate sector, but abuses of power may also occur amongst the leadership of organisations of the oppressed and marginalised, or within the university itself.

Rhodes University has shown that, despite its colonial trappings, it can play a role in developing a Critical Tradition. Hopefully, as it faces new challenges, it can find ways to play an even greater role. To conclude, I wish to quote from Albie Sachs's Foreword to Voices of the Transition. He notes 'the twin anxieties that at times undermine critical intellectual discourse these days: fear of being considered anti-government and unpatriotic, and fear of being regarded as pro-government and sycophantic', and goes on to identify intellectuals 'who inhabit the huge and fascinating terrain in-between, and who are not afraid whom they might please and whom they might offend'.

This, I believe, captures the challenge of the Critical Tradition in the post-apartheid era.
